My dear Edward Jaguer, after rushing across Paris by taxi I finally encountered my travelling companions as they poured out of the Lido under the weight of champagne corks and stolen beer mats. I spent the following day buying large quantities of books, which I only managed to squeeze into the bus by struggling through the heaps of souvenirs my companions thought fit to return with. Plastic models of the Eiffel Tower in various sizes and ballpoint pens in the shape of General de Gaulle being the most popular.

Although it was a very short conversation we had, it was useful to me, at least in getting rid of a few misconceptions that I had. I only regret that we did not have more time as there were many points I would have liked to have gone into, though perhaps we can meet again when I pass through Paris to Amsterdam - probably in November.

I would be very interested to meet Granell when he visits Spain and he will be very welcome to stay with us in Zaragoza. If he is not able to come to Zaragoza possibly I could visit him in Valencia or wherever he happens to be.

Best wishes to you and your wife.

Philip

P.S. I apologise for burdening you with more English but unfortunately my translator is enjoying a well-deserved holiday.
